The Grub-ſtreet Journal. NUMB. 171.

Thursday, APRIL 5. 1733.

Mr. BAVIUS,

WHile this humour of publiſhing books by weekly parcels continues, it would be no unacceptable ſervice in the members of your ſociety, to direct the choice of the public, by criticiſing the ſeveral ſchemes and performances as they come out, and ſhewing them what the one is, and what they may expect from the other.

The uſe of ſuch criticiſm has been often verify'd by your learned Journal. Since that maſterly one of ISAAC DE DUONUS appeared in it, Dr. Alleyn's New Diſpenſatory has intirely loſt the little credit it had before; and other inaccurate productions, vamped up to impoſe on the world, would do ſo too, when their demerits came to be made known by a critical examination: which can never be imploy'd more ſeaſonably, than when there are two editions of the ſame book going forward at a time, like thoſe of Rapin's Hiſtory of England, and Bayle's Critical Dictionary.

I call the General Dictionary hiſtorical and critical, of which there is lately a propoſal publiſhed, an edition of this laſt author. That appears to be the chief deſign of the propoſers, in oppoſition to the firſt undertakers; the additions which they pretend to give, being only an artifice to draw the ſubſcribers over to themſelves, in hopes of a completer work.

Authors generally exceed in their propoſals: but I do not think that ſuch exceſſes are always the effect of a finiſter view; they are doubtleſs often owing to the authors having too good an opinion of their own ſufficiency. But the undertakers of the General Dictionary have promiſed a work, which they are conſcious they are not able to perform; and conſequently ſeem to have entered into a formal deſign of impoſing on the public.

The article relating to the Eaſtern Hiſtory, which they propoſe to introduce, furniſhes ſufficient matter to prove this charge. They aſſure us, that they "have not had recourſe barely to d'Herbelot's Dictionary, and other works "on that ſubject, written in the European languages, but "to the oriental authors and manuſcripts." Whereas it appears clearly from their way of writing the oriental names in the article of Abbaſſa, which they offer as a ſpecimen of their performance, that they are ſtrangers both to the one, and the other.

Firſt they write the name of Abbaſſa's brother Haron Raſchid: 'tis true, ſome foreign authors write it that way; but ſuch a plea does not excuſe, but condemn them. For can they be ignorant that GREAVES, POCOCK, HYDE, and the reſt of the Engliſh authors skilled in the oriental languages, write Harun Raſhid, or rather al Raſhid, as the Engliſh orthography requires? And would they in writing for the uſe of Engliſh men chooſe foreign authors for their guides rather than their own? If ſo, why did they not write Rachid after the French, or Raſcid according to the Italians? But the truth is, for all their pretending to have recourſe to many authors, they conſulted none but D'HERBELOT, nor even him ſufficiently. One would even think they never looked into that author beyond the article of Abbaſſa, where the name in queſtion is erroneouſly printed; for in the very next to it, the name is written Haroun al Raſchid: and in the preface they would have found D'Herbelot's reaſon for uſing the ſch, inſtead of the ch, which is the French character correſponding to the Engliſh ſh. Now theſe helps would have enabled them to write the Arabic names true, without underſtanding a letter of the Arabic language.

In like manner, for want of changing the orthography, they write Giaffar, inſtead of Jaffar: now it is eaſy to conceive what confuſion ſuch inaccuracy muſt introduce in a work, to be compiled chiefly out of foreign Dictionaries, written in different languages, and conſequently varying from each other in the manner of writing proper names peculiar to nations which do not uſe the Roman character. In a French Dictionary, for inſtance, many names are under the letter C, which in an Engliſh one ſhould be placed under S; others in O, which ought to come under W; ſome in G and D, which belong to J; others in J, which ſhould be removed to Y. There will be occaſion for like tranſpoſitions in extracting from the Dictionaries written in other languages: thus the Portugueſe write Xerif for Sharif; the Dutch Sjurijani, or Zjurzjani, for Jorjani; the Germans Tſchelebi, inſtead of Chelebi. The neceſſary conſequence then of the authors of the General Dictionary tranſcribing names as they find them, will be, that not only innumerable articles will be placed under wrong letters, but many times the ſame names paſſing for ſo many different ones, under the ſeveral literal diſguiſes, muſt be repeated under different letters, a misfortune which hath already befallen ſome Dictionaries of the kind.

There are two faults more to be taken notice of in the article of Abbaſſa, on the head or orthography. The title of Harun al Raſhid, as ſucceſſor of Mohammed or Mahomet, is Khalifah: this the authors of the General Dictionary could not but know, if they conſulted the oriental authors and manuſcripts. I ſhould be glad to know therefore, on what authority they have written Khaliff? and why they did not rather retain the old corrupt word Calif, than introduce a new one? Or it may be asked, how they came in this point to forſake D'HERBELOT, who in the ſame article writes Khalife, (tho' frequently elſewhere Khalifah) and yet follow him, with regard to Abbaſſides? a word no way conformable to the Arabic idiom: according to which they ſhould have ſaid the family, or rather the children of Abbas. On this occaſion it may be proper to obſerve with regard to the Bibliotheque Orientale of D'HERBELOT, that tho' it contains a vaſt treaſure of eaſtern knowledge, yet it is full of the faults of the preſs, as well as inaccuracies of of the pen, the author not living to publiſh it himſelf. But methinks it became ſuch great critics, purſuant to their engagement, to correct the errors, with which the authors they make uſe of abound, to have begun with him. And it may be preſumed, if they had poſſeſſed the talent they pretend to, they would never have omitted ſo fair an opportunity of ſhewing it; eſpecially, conſidering ſome reputation was to be got by correcting the works of ſo great a man as D'HERBELOT. Inſtead of this they make the words, where they alter them, worſe than they found them; and are ſo unlucky, as to err, whenever they either follow or diſſent from that author.

It appears from their management with regard to this article of Abbaſſa, that they diſtruſted their ſucceſs in it; for the four faults we have indicated, are committed within the compaſs of three lines, which was all they would venture to produce. And that they might not be obliged to give more, they have placed the article of Abdolonymus before it, contrary to the alphabetical order in which they ought to be ranged.

As to the other two articles, the firſt from BAYLE, and the ſecond of their own compoſing, I have not yet examined them. I ſhall therefore only obſerve at preſent with regard to that of Abdolonymus, that there is nothing in it which might not be drawn up at ſecond-hand from USHER, MORERY, and other modern writers. And that they have not had recourſe to the originals, may be preſumed from the note D, where both DIODORUS SICULUS and Q. CURTIUS are mentioned, but the places of neither cited. As to the notes, they are a meer heap of quotations, dry and flat; without any thing of that animating ſpirit which conſtantly accompanies BAYLE's, and renders them generally more entertaining, as well as inſtructive, than the text.

Hence, Mr. BAVIUS, the public may ſee what right they have to demand ſpecimens with all propoſals: for if the authors go ever ſo little out of their depth, it is an even hazard but they entrap themſelves.

After all, with regard to the General Dictionary, there needed no ſpecimen to prove the deſign of impoſition on the authors: that appears ſufficiently from the propoſal itſelf. Of all the ſupplemental articles (which are to ſwell the work to ſix volumes) only ſome of thoſe compoſed by the authors themſelves are drawn up after the manner of BAYLE's. But ſince none but choice articles are to be introduced, why do they not all deſerve the ſame care? 'Tis true, this may be ſaid to be a fault chiefly in point of uniformity —— In a word, the impoſition extends to the very impreſſion of the book. By propoſing ſix volumes, the public is doubtleſs put in hopes of two entire volumes of additions to BAYLE: but in that alſo they will find themſelves deceived, for the page in which the General Dictionary is to be printed is ſo much ſcantier every way than the French copy, that ſuppoſing the tranſlation to contain an equal number of ſheets with the original, Bayle itſelf will take up above five of their volumes; at the ſame time ſubſcribers muſt pay conſiderably more for their ſheets, than thoſe of the firſt undertakers. So that by a groſs computation the ſix volumes of the General Dictionary will coſt about ten or eleven pounds; whereas the complete edition of Bayle will not exceed five pounds, or five pound ten. Let the public judge, whether it will be worth their while to pay as much for one volume, at moſt, of additions, like thoſe they have given in their ſpecimen, as the other intire tranſlation will amount to.

I am, Sir, your humble ſervant,

A. B.

THE ſhort account in our 168th Journal of the ingenious, beneficial, and diſintereſted project of the Gentleman's Magazine, in abridging, and diffuſing all the daily and weekly papers of our ſociety through town and country, at a ſmall price, for the public good, has given the learned projector ſome offence. I thought I had ſpoken with all the caution and reſpect due to ſo eminent a perſon, while I was acting the part of an hiſtorian, and repreſenting the ſtate of the controverſy betwixt him and his younger brother the London Magazine. A ſtrict regard to truth and impartiality, obliged me to mention the ſentiments of one of my brethren concerning piracy: who juſtly obſerved, that in relation to the reprinting of the public papers, there were two ſorts of it, a downright and an upright piracy: the former exerciſed by ſuch as had not the leaſt ſhare in any of the papers; and the latter by ſuch as were concerned in one, or more. And tho' I had charitably ſuppoſed, that the ingenious projector might privately hold ſome ſuch ſhare in another's name, conſiſtent with his place in the poſt-office, and conſequently exerciſed no other than an upright piracy, a piracy not at all incompatible with the character of an upright man among printers and book-ſellers: yet he imagined, that I charged him with a downright piracy, from which he thought it neceſſary to vindicate himſelf.

This vindication conſiſting of thirteen verſes in the true, unfeigned Grub-ſtreet ſtile, tho' it reflected upon our Journal, and upon me in particular; yet to ſhew our impartiality towards the author, and ourſelves, in conſulting both his intereſt and our own, was inſerted in an advertiſement in our 169th paper. The poet happened to make a ſmall miſtake in ſpelling doit dite, of which we gave a ſhort hint in that paper. In anſwer to which, the author aſſured us, in his next advertiſement, that "the falſe ſpel-"ling was actually put ſo knowingly, for the ſake of the "rhime:" which could not but ſeem very probable, becauſe in the two next verſes do'ſt and cruſt are made to rhime, which do not ſound ſo much alike as write and doit. He concluded his advertiſement thus, "It is ſuffi-"cient, that the argument was not deny'd." This argument I ſhall now conſider, which runs almoſt verbatim thus.

"Ye write your news weekly in the Grub-ſtreet Jour-"nal from every day's papers: we take our materials chief-"ly from them: therefore the crumbs we take are not "more pir'cy than your cruſt."— I am ſorry, that my brother, with whom we had dealt ſo fairly, ſhould endeavour by his wit and logic to impoſe upon his readers to our prejudice, in telling the truth indeed, but not the whole truth. The news which we take from the daily papers makes about one half of our Journal, advertiſements excepted; the reſt conſiſts of original compoſitions. The Gentleman's Magazine is nothing but a collection from other papers and pamphlets, without any original compoſitions at all.— The argument therefore muſt ſtand thus. You take half your Journal from other papers, which therefore reſembles cruſt: we take our whole Magazine from them, which therefore reſembles crumbs: therefore you are guilty of as much piracy as we. Which extraordinary way of reaſoning, is built upon this ſelf-evident propoſition, That the half is as big as the whole.

But if we conſider the deſign of the argument, which is to clear the Gentleman's Magazine from the imputation of being a downright piracy; and ſuppoſe, that our Journal was even all collected, like that, from other papers; then the argument in its whole force will be this: the Magazine is not a downright piracy, becauſe the Journal likewiſe is either a downright or an upright one.

This charge of piracy upon us, on the account of the articles of domeſtic and foreign news, collected from all the other papers, and inſerted in ours, ſhall be particularly conſidered in a little time. When I do not doubt but I ſhall make it evident, that our method of comparing the articles of one paper with thoſe of another, is not only not piratical, but extremely uſeful, and even neceſſary to put a ſtop to the currency of falſe news.

An EPIGRAM.

IN forty one, on godly ends intent,
Poor men in crowds petition'd parliament.
The country party thought them all profound heads:
The court abuſively nick-nam'd 'em round heads.
But modern courtiers give their approbation,
To all thoſe ſteps that led to reformation.
Yet now rich merchants under apprehenſion,
Join'd with all traders, dread exciſe-extenſion;
And humbly ſend inſtructions, or petition;
The courtiers all cry out, This is ſedition:
Theſe ſots, of trade and merchandize ſuch braggers,
Naught but pick-pockets are, and ſturdy beggars.
Whence can this different conduct riſe, to praiſe
Thoſe acts of paſt, and cenſure preſent days?
In every age all courtiers are the ſame;
And, as the Great direct, applaud, or blame.

A tranſlation of the 17th fable of the IVth book of PHÆDRUS; occaſion'd by reading the chapter concerning Ambaſſadors in our laſt Journal.

THE dogs once ſent ambaſſadors to JOVE,
To beg, that they ſome better life might prove;
From the rude inſults ſnatch'd of barb'rous man,
Who gave them mouldy bread all mix'd with bran;
Oft times compell'd, defrauded e'en of theſe,
With nauſeous dung their hunger to appeaſe.
With tardy feet each half-ſtarv'd envoy goes,
Vile food in ordure ſeeking with his noſe.
Them call'd, but anſw'ring not, ſlunk out of view,
HERMES at laſt, aſham'd to audience drew.
Great JOVE's tremendous face they could not bear,
But all his palace they beſh—for fear.
With clubs well bang'd, kick'd out of doors, they're hiſs'd:
But JOVE forbad the curs to be diſmiſs'd.
Their brethren wond'ring their return delay'd
So long, much fear'd ſome ſkittern they had play'd:
And ſoon as fame reveal'd their diſmal caſe,
Deputed others to ſupply their place.
But to prevent like trage-comic farce,
With copious ſpice they ſtopp'd each envoy's a——.
They go, ask, gain admittance to the throne,
On which the fire of gods ſublimely ſhone.
The forked bolt he brandiſh'd in his hand,
At which all trembled, heav'n, and ſeas, and land.
Stunn'd at the ſudden noiſe, the dogs a load
Of ſpices mix'd with odorous t— explode.
All cry, th' affront deſerves th' avenging ſtroak:
But e'er 'tis executed, JOVE thus ſpoke.
Ambaſſadors kings ought not long detain:
Nor is it hard t' impoſe a proper pain.
In my decree, as juſt reward, you'll join:
Let them, not ſoon diſmiſs'd, with hunger pine,
That they retentive faculty may gain,
And not let fly things proper to contain.
But thoſe, to all the ſcorn of human kind,
Who ſuch looſe envoys ſent, ſhall ſtand conſign'd.
In durance vile by JOVE theſe envoys caſt
The dogs expecting ſtill, both firſt and laſt;
When e'er ſtrange dog appears, unſeen before,
With cloſe ſagacious noſe his breech explore.

MÆVIUS.
